TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1875.

Asides seems to be entertained by some writers, has criticised the formation of the present Ministry. There is something anomalous in the administration of the Department of Justice and Public Instruction, in one who is not a member of either branch of the Legislature. Why the necessity of special professional qualifications for one branch of the office should be insisted on we are unable to perceive. The Minister of Justice is of course in no way the legal adviser of the Government; he has nothing to say either in the initiation, the approval, or the conduct of public prosecutions, and he simply as Minister has had transferred to his department duties that were discharged by the Colonial Secretary until the new Ministerial arrangements were sanctioned. We were under the impression that one of the recommendations of the proposal to the Legislature was contained in the circumstance that the necessity of legal co-operation was no longer rendered indispensable. It had frequently been the subject of complaint that difficulties had been thrown in the way of gentlemen engaged in the formation of Cabinets by the necessity of procuring the assistance of at least two legal gentlemen to occupy the offices of Attorney and Solicitor-General. And on looking back to the discussion in the Assembly when the creation of the new Department was sanctioned by the vote of the Assembly, we find that this complaint was referred to, and the new arrangements were spoken of as if they would effectually meet this difficulty. It was on Wednesday, November 26, 1873, that the Department of Justice and Public Instruction was created by a motion, as follows:—"1. That it is expedient to create a Department of Justice and Public Instruction to be presided over by a responsible Minister. 2. That after the passing of these resolutions the Attorney-General shall not be a member of the Executive Council, but shall continue to be the holder of a political office with a seat in Parliament, entering upon his official duties and retiring with the Ministry for the time being. 3. That the office of Solicitor-General shall be abolished."

The motion was introduced to the Assembly by the Premier, Mr. PARKES, in a long explanation.

Government to seek a Premier in the Legislative Council. One of these, anticipating that the ground would be cut from beneath him, boldly repudiated the authority of English precedent, and, although the men of longest experience in public life were of great familiarity with the practical treatment of constitutional questions, disavowed all sanction of this new doctrine, the majority of the House, either by speech or by vote, gave assent, lent it a certain sanction of implied approval. Later again, we have seen the formation of a Ministry challenged by a sweeping motion of want of confidence before its members had appealed to their constituents for re-election—a motion, professedly resting upon constitutional principle, but hardly backed by the most flimsy and vague apology for argument— a motion repugnant, under the circumstances, to those principles of fair play and temperate judgment upon which constitutional practice may be said to have its foundation. From all this it may be inferred that there is amongst us a reverence for constitutional principles, and a latent conviction that it is our truest and safest guide. But just as the manufacture of counterfeit coin bears practical testimony to the value of the sterling currency, so it must be admitted that the recognition of the importance of constitutional principle has been proved to us not only by its disposition to comply with its requirements, but also by a readiness to make constitutional principle strained out of shape, and drawn aside from its true meaning, a cover and a defence for the tactics of mere partizanship.

The forms and modes of procedure under which the business of Parliament is conducted are for the most part embodied in standing orders and rules, framed with due precision and as to the application of these rules there is an almost universal guide to be found in the recorded precedents of the House of Commons, or in explanatory works which are recognised as authorities. These forms and rules represent in a tangible form the experience of centuries,—experience gained under varied and often critical circumstances by men weighed with the responsibility of administering the affairs of a great nation. Our forms derived or adapted from the practice of the House of Commons, are no random productions, have no merely casual origin. We may like some of them singly, and, apart from the like of history, doubt their wisdom and usefulness in some instances, they have now and again seemed to be productive of mischievous effects. Wreathed from their purpose, they have become tools for the worst of factious obstruction, facilities for the waste of precious time, opportunities for the triumph of unworthy men. But we accept them and retain them, nevertheless, in the unshaken belief that in the main their operation is for good, and that the evil results of their perversion are but illustrations of the abuse to which every good rule is liable. Our patience under delays is reinforced by the feeling that those delays are the price paid for a system which provides a scope for exhaustive discussion. We shun the less under the inflictions of some prosy talker or Parliamentary scold, because we know that their power to bore or to disgust is given by the same rules which protect the man of sense and moderation who may be an advocate of compromise. Parliamentary rules may, by their abuse, give too free play to trickery and violence, but they guarantee the voice of honesty shall have a hearing, and that the speech of the weak shall not be stifled.

Over and beyond the rules of Parliamentary procedure are the principles, and customs and precedents of constitutional action; and to a large extent there is a parallelism between them. When we talk of constitutional action we have in view the history and practice of generations of politicians and statesmen, and the principles by which they have more or less consciously been governed, or which may more or less clearly deducible from their conduct. We have in this case a wider field, and in keener contest than in the other experience gained in the wider field, and in keener contest than our own to guide us. And in this case as in the other, we may well hesitate before rejecting an old principle or striking out into a new line of practice, unless it be plain that the principle is inapplicable to present times and to colonial conditions, or that the old line of practice, whilst out of accord with the apparent dictates of temporary expediency, is unenforced by considerations of a broader and more permanent character.

But what are generally understood as constitutional principles and constitutional practice cannot be said to have been laid down or marked out with the same precision as the rules of Parliamentary procedure or the customs of Parliament. The action of the parties and party leaders, the relations subsisting between the different branches of the Legislature, the respect or courtesy accorded by each to the other, by both to the Crown, and by the Crown in return, to both are regulated not so much by definite prescription and rule as by understandings, traditions and precedents that admit a greater latitude of interpretation, and are scarcely as to their applicability or inapplicability to particular circumstances, parcelled off by hard-and-fast lines of demarcation. It cannot be said that in every given juncture, "this case comes within the meaning of that particular law." All that can be said is that, according to the teaching of the past, under given circumstances such a course ought or ought not to be followed.

One of the things which is not uncommon among men who are the lawless upon their familiarity with constitutional forms to defend their own conduct by the remark that this or that great leader in the past would have acted in a precisely similar manner, or to condemn the conduct of their opponents by remarking that such a course as they have followed would not have been tolerated for a moment by the statesmen who have acted history. In either case the assumptions of this sort are to be corrected as assumptions only until their correctness has been tested by the light of history and the principles deducible therefrom; and this testing we must perform for ourselves. In the case of Parliamentary procedure, not only are there fixed laws and well-established authorities; there are also in the persons of the Speaker and the President of the Council, officers whose special duty it is to study and to expound them—to add it is to warn and to reprove the infraction of sound rules or departures from the accepted line of practice.

In view of these distinctions, it is hardly necessary to argue at any length, that far greater circumspection and self-control are required in dealing with constitutional questions than in dealing with points of Parliamentary law and order. Where the course is not marked out with sharply-defined precision, and there is no appointed guide to indicate it officially, the danger of divergence to the Young Men's Christian Association.—The society had its monthly excursion on last Saturday afternoon. An unusually large number of the members and their friends availed themselves of the opportunity of spending the afternoon together. The steamer Gladiolus took the excursionists to Athol Gardens, where they dined in various places. After those present had partaken of some refreshments, the steamer left for home about 4.30. All appeared to have enjoyed themselves thoroughly.

Marlborough Cricket Club.—A performance was given last evening in the hall of the school by the members of the Marlborough Dramatic Club in aid of the funds of the Marlborough Orphanage. The hall was very large and fashionable audience. Both standing and sitting rooms were fully taken up. The entertainment opened with the dinner. The first play was followed by the Sheridan Anagrams Dramatic Club. Barry Nicholson, and a fancy dance given by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Specter, Bridgeman, and Miss Glub. The prompter, Bridgeman, and Miss Glub, brought the evening's amusement to a close, and secured a considerable amount of fun.

rescuee, three men returned with a man who had been seen and talked deeply with a face with it. I then got some laundry for deceased, but cannot say whether it was given to him, or to the brother who was with him.

Orange, for a doctor. The Bonnie Time relates that John Street was with an accident some weeks ago by cutting his leg with an axe. The wound was rapidly recovering, but on the day of a recent match he walked a considerable distance, and the leg pained him very much. Not long after at the time, the foolish fellow commenced striking the injured limb, and he again had to take to his bed, his leg gradually becoming worse, a subscription was raised for the purpose of getting a proper treatment, and the leg be taken off in the present low condition of the man, what the consequences may be it is difficult to say. The Free Press reports that the body of a man was found, naked and shrivelled up from prolonged exposure, in the limb of a tree on the Lachlan, at Cowi Cowi. It is probable that the man had been swimming in the water, and of swimming across the river, or for a bath, when the river was high, and that he had got entangled in the tree and was unable to get out. The body was found in the river, and the receding water had left his body in the tree, where it is supposed to have been for at least a month.

wound was serious, but not of a dangerous character.

CRICKET.—A match was played last night on the University Paddock, between the M.C.C. and Sydney Grammar School C.C., and resulted in a victory for the M.C.C. by 4 runs to spare. The players who made double figures were—for the M.C.C., Mr. H. B. Radford 18; and for the S.G., T. Urwin 16. The bowling of A. W. and F. Smith, M.C.C., and of G. Hunter for the S.G., was very good. On the same day a match took place at Park between W. S. Friend and Co.'s C.C. and C.C., which was decided in the first innings, the former the score being—W. S. Friend 107, Argyle 11.

RHYMES CORRUPT.—GRATITUDE AND CONFERENCE.—The knowledge of the man whose life has been devoted to digestion and nutrition, and by whom the appetite for preparation of well-seasoned meats, Mr. Rye's famous "Rye's Adonis," is so delicately flavoured, and so many happy delectable meals,—"Glad receive it," as the poet says, "with grateful thanks." It is better, I say, I think. Each packet is labelled—"Rye's Adonis," London, England. Manufactured by Rye and Co., manufacturers of dietetic articles, 1, St. Andrew Street, London.
